A fistula is created for dialysis access. The fistula connects the vein to the artery. From the dialysis machine, a catheter is inserted into the vein and another is inserted into the artery. The blood flows from the artery through the fistula and into the vein, allowing the dialysis machine to filter the blood.